ABSTRACT: Many companies coming to the market have issued non-voting shares to keep the voting power within the family. How the voting structure can be designed to safeguard the legacy of a PLC's founder and protect his successors against takeover is discussed.

TEXT: (Photograph Omitted)

Suppose Sir Rocco Forte were to succeed in buying back his former company's first-class hotels from Granada, and in floating the business over again. He might be forgiven - second time around - for wanting to insure against a repetition of recent events by securing management control into the distant future. Over the years countless businessmen have had this idea, which is why so many companies coming to the market have issued non-voting shares (or shares with restricted rights), to keep the voting power within the family. Indeed that option still exists. So how, in practice, can the voting structure be designed to safeguard the legacy of a plc's founder and protect his successors against takeover?

'Company law allows you to do virtually anything,' points out Graham Stedman, a partner in the corporate department at City solicitors Theodore
